Humans are born with the ability to understand language. Without any special training, children learn to speak by listening to other people's speech. Early people began using spoken language several million years ago. Actually, it was language which made it possible for human societies to develop.

There are thousands of languages throughout the world. Some are spoken by millions of people. Mandarin Chinese, English and Spanish are the most widely spoken languages in the world.

Most countries have a standard, or official, language so that native speakers can understand each other. Some countries have more than one standard language. Canada, for example, has two standard languages: English and French.

Many languages are related. People who study languages group related ones together. English, German and Swedish belong to the Germanic group. French, Spanish and Italian are called Romance languages. The Slavic language family of Eastern Europe includes Russian and Polish. Chinese belongs to the Sino-Tibetan language family of Asia.

At times people need to speak with others who do not know their language. Europeans who came to the Americas hundreds of years ago needed a way to speak with Native Americans. They communicated using a simplified form of their languages. These simple forms are called pidgin languages. When a pidgin language develops and replaces the original language of the group, it is called a creole language.

Even people who share the same language may develop different ways of speaking. People in different parts of a country may pronounce words differently or use local words and expressions. These varieties of the same language are called dialects. Languages often interact and influence each other. Countries have borders, but languages and dialects do not. One language may borrow words from another language. Many English speakers, for example, use such words as pajamas from Hindi, pasta from Italian, karate from Japanese and paradise from Persian.

(True or False)

1. Polish and German belong to the same language group.
